

- What are your core values and beliefs?

- One of my core values and beliefs is authenticity which means staying true to who I am. I value being honest and genuine, preferring to rely on my own practical ways of doing things. But I'm straightforward and prefer real experiences over pretending. By being authentic I stick to my individuality, think logically, and make choices that feel right for me and my team without being swayed by others.

The other one is compassion which means helping practically. I try to solve problems and assist without making a big emotional show. I respect others' freedom and give real help when needed, focusing on getting the job done well. I might not talk a lot about feelings, but I'm dependable and always ready to lend a hand in a practical way, making sure work gets done smoothly and efficiently. My compassion shines through my reliability and practical support for my team.

- What are your goals and aspirations?

- My goals and aspirations as a web developer in the MERN stack are to become highly skilled in React for building websites, master Node.js and Express for backend development, and excel in using MongoDB. I aim to lead development initiatives, create impactful user-centric applications, stay updated with emerging technologies, and collaborate with teams to deliver innovative, scalable solutions. Additionally, I aspire to establish a strong online presence, share knowledge through blogs or guidelines, create impactful web solutions, grow professionally, and establish myself as an asset in the field of web development.

- What are the first steps you will take to build your personal brand?

- The first steps I will take to build my personal brand is I'll connect with various job recruiters from job post through social medias. First, I'll organize my LinkedIn account and make sure post regularly. I'll also try to contact those job recruiters and showcase my project. Besides I'll join Facebook group for job posting and contact those recruiters. Other than that, I'll update my GitHub and portfolio.

- How does personal branding differ from self-promotion, and why is this distinction important?

- Personal branding is about showing who I truly am as a web developer. It showcases my skills, values, and personality. It's like creating my own unique identity to build trust and connections. Self-promotion, on the other hand, is mostly just talking about your achievements without focusing on being real or genuine.

The difference matters because personal branding is about giving effort to being myself and sharing what I'm good at in an honest way. It will help people trust me and build long-term relationships. Self-promotion might make me look good for a moment, but it will not show the real me or create trust in the same way. Personal branding is about being authentic, while self-promotion can sometimes feel more like showing off.

- What are you most proud of?

- I'm most proud of my determination to learn web development. It's been a journey full of challenges, but each obstacle I've faced, whether learning new coding languages or solving problems, has made me stronger. What makes me happiest is my refusal to quit, even when things are tough. I celebrate every small victory, like understanding a complex concept or finishing a project.

Most importantly, my enthusiasm to keep learning and growing fuels my progress. I'm proud that I stick with it and continue to develop my skills, as this passion for improvement is what drives me forward in web development.